

I chose to study the presence of external security cameras in my hometown. During my excursion, I discovered two compelling observations:

1. The objects security cameras most often point at is dumpsters, to prevent illegal waste disposal.
2. The locations with the greatest quantities of security cameras is gas stations.

I found it ironic the two locations society needs to monitor the heaviest were those that had negative environmental impacts, such as waste pollution and natural resource consumption - issues humans tend to overlook. I constructed the following collages as a commentary:
